L. Brooks Patterson Diagnosed with Pancreatic Cancer

by DREW HOWARD

Oakland County Executive L. Brooks Patterson announced Tuesday he has been diagnosed with stage-4 pancreatic cancer during a press conference attended by colleagues, friends, and family.

The longtime county executive confirmed at the press conference that he will continue to serve his term while he seeks ongoing treatment at the Karmanos Cancer Institute.

Patterson, however, made it clear that he has no intention to seek re-election for an eighth term in 2020.

“I have every intention of coming back and finishing the term,” Patterson said. “I’ll be out of here in four years, God willing and the creek don’t rise.”

Patterson, 80, has served with Oakland County for more than 40 years, starting his career in 1973 as the Oakland County Prosecutor before being elected as executive in 1992.

The cancer diagnosis isn’t Patterson’s first health scare. In August 2012, the executive was involved in a motor vehicle accident that hospitalized him for several weeks with several broken bones.

Patterson, while certainly emotional, attempted to keep a light tone during Tuesday’s announcement. “Alex Trebek has nothing on me,” he joked. “I’m fighting this cancer to be among the 10 percent who survive it. I will.”

U.S. REP. ELISSA SLOTKIN held her first town hall event at Oakland University on Thursday. Hundreds of constituents, from high school students to senior citizens, were in the audience to press the 8th district representative on issues including health care, gun control, impeachment, and border security. Part of her “radical listening tour,” Rep. Slotkin said that it was a good opportunity to talk directly to people and hear what their concerns were, especially regarding increasing polarization in Washington.

Barnes and Noble Comes to The Village of Rochester Hills

by ELENA DURNBAUGH

The latest store at The Village of Rochester Hills is a new take on an old classic.

Barnes and Noble opened a store prototype at The Village of Rochester Hills Wednesday, which features a cleaner, more modern look. The store is the first of its kind in Michigan and one of 10 in the United States. Books and customer experience are the focus of the store, which aims to promote discovery and community with its design.

“We wanted to create a bookstore with a contemporary feel... with books at the center,” said Frank Morabito, vice president of stores at Barnes and Noble. “We look forward to serving the residents of this community.”

The space is open and brightly lit, and shorter shelves and hanging signs make the bookfloor easier to navigate. Kiosks, where customers can search for books, are dotted throughout the store, and illuminated bookcases brighten many of the shelves along the back wall. Two circular book theaters, round tables with a central tower featuring face-out books, help readers explore new titles.

“We want to help them on that journey of discovery,” said store manager Lisa Kargol. “Books are the primary product of what we do.”

Booksellers will support the more customer-friendly layout and help personalize the shopping experience. Equipped with tablets, they’ll help people find things in-store or place a custom order. Employees will also be able to process credit transactions from the book floor, providing customers with another place to complete their purchase without having to wait in line.

Slotkin Holds First Town Hall at OU

by ELENA DURNBAUGH

U.S. Rep. Elissa Slotkin of Michigan’s 8th Congressional District hosted her first town hall since being elected at Oakland University last Thursday.

The meeting, which Slotkin characterized as an “act of radical listening,” was part of Slotkin’s campaign promise to hold a town hall with her constituents every three months.

“Something happens when you are in the community listening to people,” Slotkin said at the start of the town hall. “We are a different breed sent to Washington with a different mission: to get something done.”

The focus of the evening was health care, but attendees were able to submit questions they wanted the congresswoman to address on any topic.

Slotkin covered a variety of subjects including health care, border security, gun control, antisemitism and hate speech, student debt, and the Green New Deal. She also talked about the state of American democracy and the Mueller report, which as of last week had not yet been submitted to Attorney General William Barr.

On health care, Slotkin said she supported a more expansive Medicare program, but did not go as far as some of her Democratic counterparts who support a single-payer system. Instead, Slotkin envisioned a system that...

would automatically enroll uninsured people into Medicare and would allow all Americans to buy into the program without requiring those with private insurance to leave it.

“Everyone has the right to health care they can afford,” Slotkin said. “If we provide good coverage at a good cost, it will be the most popular program in the country.

Slotkin said that health care was one of the most common issues she heard about from her constituents.

“Health care is a very personal issue, so it’s pretty painful and emotional for people, and so when they’re talking to me, it’s not a policy conversation,” she said. “People have a lot of pain, and they want to be heard.”

When discussing border security, Slotkin described the country’s immigration system as “broken” and said that she supported increased border security. “I just want to be smart about it,” she said. “We can’t selectively enforce a broken system.

The congresswoman also highlighted Michigan’s role in the conversation as a northern border state.

On the issue of gun control, Slotkin said that she supported universal background checks, closing loopholes, and standardizing how guns are bought. According to the congresswoman, there is currently a bill sitting with the Republican-controlled Senate addressing gun control.

“If you’re interested in seeing that issue move, you have to articulate that,” she said.

Slotkin also addressed the rise in hate crimes, antisemitism, and white supremacy in the country. She said that it was important for people to show leadership and speak out against those ideas.

“We need to call a spade a spade and call out hate speech whenever we see it,” Slotkin said.

Another topic covered at the town hall was student debt. Slotkin said that she thought that interest on student loans should be capped at 2.5 percent and that federal funding should be increased.

“If you went to Michigan State 50 years ago, your life is completely different than a current Michigan State student. And that changes your outlook on life,” Slotkin told the Gazette after the event. “We shouldn’t be surprised when our youngest people are the most focused on to the big sweeping ideas that are being proposed for real change because they are living a life that is harder than their parents.

Slotkin was asked about the sweeping changes being proposed by fellow Democrats in legislation like the Green New Deal, which addresses climate change and economic inequality. Although she said she supported the “spirit of the Green New Deal,” Slotkin said that the legislation needed to take a more pragmatic approach in order to pass.

“I believe in passing something real,” she said.

According to Slotkin, climate change should be tackled from an economic angle. “That is the way to do it more precipitously and see it done in our lifetime,” she said.

“Many people submitted questions about the overall state of democracy in the country. Slotkin said that she was working together with other members of the House on the H.R. 1 “For the People Act,” which seeks to strengthen the democratic process by improving people’s access to the ballot box and reducing the influence of big money in politics. As part of the legislation, Slotkin proposed a bill that closes the loophole allowing foreigners to buy ads in election campaigns.

“We have to fight for our democracy,” she said.

At Thursday town hall, Slotkin said that she was waiting on the Mueller report before making any decisions about impeachment and said she planned to read the report in its entirety. She highlighted that earlier this month the House passed a unanimous bipartisan resolution to make the report public.

Following the conclusion of the report last Friday, Slotkin released a statement affirming that position.

As we review the investigation’s findings, I believe both Congress and the American people should be able to read the report for themselves,” she said.

“Two weeks ago, Congress unanimously voted to make Mueller’s full report public—and that is what the Attorney General should do.”

After the town hall, Slotkin said that it was a good opportunity to talk directly to people and hear what their concerns were, especially regarding increasing polarization in Washington.

“Michiganders look at what’s happening in Washington and they don’t like it,” she said. “I think there’s a real concern over this tone that things are just not getting done. That the House can pass something that the Senate doesn’t take up. You head that out over and over again: ‘how do you move things’?”

Kathleen VanPoppellen was at the town hall to hear what Slotkin had to say and to express her support. She worked on Slotkin’s campaign last year, even though she identifies as a Republican, and supported Slotkin because she said Slotkin understands Washington and knows how to get things done. She said she was impressed by the congresswoman’s civility and refusal to attack people with differing political views.

“I have the utmost confidence that she’s working for us,” VanPoppellen said.

Evan Catsburg is a junior at Stoney Creek High School. He came to the town hall hoping to ask the congresswoman about abortion, which was an issue that she did not address. Catsburg said he was glad to hear Slotkin identify herself as fiscally conservative because he was concerned about spending in Washington.

“I believe she does have good ideas and good intentions,” Catsburg said.

Oakland University student and president of the College Democrats at Oakland University, Chase Lindenthal, liked what he heard from Slotkin.

“She answered the questions directly,” he said. “We want her to give her opinions and not some sugar-coated bull.”

On the issue of health care, Lindenthal said that Slotkin was offering a great alternative to a single-payer system that was more likely to win bipartisan support.

“We have to have people like Elissa running in states like Michigan,” he said.

Oakland University President Ora Hirsch Pescovitz said that she was glad that the university campus was able to provide a place for the town hall.

“We welcome politicians from all parties,” Pescovitz said. “It’s a great venue for politicians to come and express their views and for the public to come and learn and participate in public discourse.”

Slotkin represents Michigan’s 8th congressional district, which covers North Oakland, Livingston, and Ingham counties. She recently opened up a second office in Rochester Hills at 445 S. Livernois. To learn contact her, visit slotkin.house.gov/.

New Barns and Noble Now Open in Rochester Hills

Beyond basic help, booksellers also happy to talk about books and make recommendations.

Jeremiah Johnston has worked with Barnes and Noble for 23 years and is part of the new store’s team. He said he’s looking forward to offering strong customer service and building a community around the new location.

“Anybody can go to a website. We’re here to put the book in their hands,” he said. “This is the future of Barnes and Noble. I’m excited to take it that next step.”

In addition to books, the new store aims to be a place where people can gather. An open area near the magazine section is filled with low tables and comfortable chairs for people to sit and read or socialize. There’s also a large community work table where people can meet to collaborate or work independently. Outside, patio seating provides more places for people to sit when the weather is nice.

The children’s section includes a Lego activity table and a “jungle gym” display for toys and popular children’s characters, which makes the space fun for young readers. Near the big picture windows at the front of the store, there’s a designated storytime space focused in other ways, too. Local authors are featured throughout the store and there are special sections highlighting books on local sports, interests, and history.

Events will also have a local focus. Wednesday night, Detroit writer Mitch Albom came for a book signing. Kasey Pierce, another local author, will be at the store Friday at 7 p.m. Kargol said that the store also plans to coordinate with events happening in The Village.

“These prototypes are really customized for their community,” said Mei Sanchez, senior manager for corporate communications at Barnes and Noble.

Kargol, who is also Rochester resident, said she envisions her store as a community gathering place. Whether it’s people sitting in between the aisles to page through a new book, stopping by the cafe to grab a cup of coffee, or local high school students meeting up to study, she said she hopes it will be somewhere people will want to spend time.

Barnes and Noble already has a store in Rochester, which will stay open.

“This is a really strong market for us,” Kargol said. “We think it’s going to add convenience to customers.”

The store is in the former location of Bath and Body Works and B Spot Burgers. Barnes and Noble in The Village of Rochester Hills is open Monday through Saturday 9 a.m.-10 p.m. and on Sundays from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m.

How to Dismantle the Two-Party System

PERSPECTIVES

Op-Ed by NATHAN INKS

The easiest way to win an election is to limit competition from other candidates. This has been the approach Republicans and Democrats across the nation have taken to ensure the steadiness of the two-party system for decades.

Many states make it significantly more difficult for third-party or independent candidates to qualify to be on the ballot. For example, in Michigan a Democratic or Republican candidate for Congress needs to collect at least 1,000 signatures, while an independent congressional candidate needs to collect at least 3,000 signatures. Candidates who belong to a minor party are nominated via convention.

But Republicans and Democrats do not merely rig the rules; they also change them when necessary. In 1990 when Democrats in Virginia realized that their failure to challenge popular Republican Senator John Warner would keep them off the ballot in the next election, the state legislature convened a special session to change the definition of “party” under state law. Colorado Republicans barely avoided a similar fate in 2010 when Tom Tancredo left the GOP to run for governor as a third-party candidate. The Republican candidate squeaked over the threshold by 20,000 votes in an election with nearly 1.8 million ballots cast.

Some ballot access restrictions certainly make sense. Without a reasonable threshold, voters would enter the voting booth to be confronted with a multi-page ballot filled with a few serious candidates intermixed with dozens of noncontenders. Such a scenario would discourage, rather than encourage, an educated electorate, as voters could be overwhelmed with choices. That being said, methods to reduce the number of “joke candidates” should be minimal, and many current laws are not remotely related to serving this purpose. There is simply no reason that an independent candidate should have to collect three times the number of signatures as a partisan candidate, and any candidate who has managed to collect at least 1,000 signatures has shown at least a minimal amount of dedication to campaigning to be taken seriously.

One Michigan Congressman, Republican Justin Amash, hopes to change all of this. Amash recently introduced the Ballot Fairness Act, which would require states to impose the same ballot access requirements on all general congressional elections, regardless of whether they are nominated by a political party; the bill would also eliminate straight ticket voting. Because the federal government has no general ability to regulate states’ ballot access laws – as long as they are otherwise constitutional – the bill would only apply to general elections for Senators, Representatives, and their territorial equivalents.

Amash’s reform is different from typical election reforms, which tend to be self-serving. Republican legislatures changing the rules to help the GOP, and Democratic legislatures doing the opposite. Amash’s bill is just the opposite. Although eliminating straight-ticket voting has been a mantra of Michigan Republicans in recent years, as a self-described libertarian, Amash has likely been one of the biggest benefactors of straight-ticket voting in the state, and he is probably one of the only elected officials who is openly advocating to make it easier to get on the ballot to potentially challenge him.

Unfortunately, the bill is unlikely to gain much traction, as neither Republicans nor Democrats have expressed an overwhelming willingness to make it easier for third-party and independent challengers to gain ballot access. Regardless, it is refreshing to see a politician who is putting principles before partisanship. This country needs more elected officials who want to see an increase in good candidates running for office instead of protecting the arbitrary nature of a broken and abused two-party system.

Measles Outbreak Continues: Nearly Two Dozen Cases

The Oakland County Health Department has confirmed 21 cases of measles in the area since March 13.

Symptoms include high fever, cough, runny nose, and red, watery eyes, followed by the appearance of tiny white spots inside the mouth and a red body rash.

The disease is highly contagious. If symptoms develop, do not go directly to the doctor or the emergency room. Call ahead so that they can take precautions to limit exposure.

The measles vaccine is effective within 72 hours of exposure. To see a full list of exposure dates and locations, visit oak.gov/health/.

Sensory Processing Changes in Dementia

Spring seems to be making its way to Michigan and just as our seasons change, you may find that caring for a loved one with dementia requires you to make a change, too.

Today, let’s talk about the “Sensory Processing” changes those with dementia may experience. With dementia, the brain is deteriorating and so too is a person’s sense of sight, hearing, taste, and touch. Dementia presents a new level of sensory input that is unique to each person. What they once enjoyed can now be overwhelming. So, know that the extent of these changes are unique to each individual and may change. One approach may not work for all and some may require an abundance of individualized care. Keep a notebook around to take notes. Note the time and place of occurrences and see if you can uncover patterns that will help with routines and adjustments to a care plan.

For example, making its way to Michigan and just as our seasons change, you may find that caring for a loved one with dementia requires you to make a change, too.

A person’s sense of vision is often impacted by dementia. A loss of depth perception can occur, as well as a loss of peripheral vision, the need for high color contrast, the need for brighter lighting, and even the loss of half of their visual field. Keep in mind that while the eyes are healthy, it’s the brain that is being impacted by dementia that leads to these problems.

A study in the Archives of Clinical Neuropsychology cites lesions found on the parietal and temporal lobes as the contributing factor for the impairment of binocular depth perception. Dr. Deborah Bier explains in her Dementia Wise training that this can manifest when there is carpeting with patterns in it. The loss of depth perception can cause patterns in carpeting to appear as “objects” on a rug and they may try to pick up the “objects.” If you notice this behavior, you now know the cause and can work to redirect. Reassure them that someone will pick-up the “objects” and redirect the conversation or have them participate in a meaningful activity they are able to do and enjoy.

The loss of depth perception can be used as a tool to prevent wandering. Placing a black rug in front of doors will be perceived as a hole in the ground that they, of course, don’t want to encounter. Utilizing this information to adjust how you care for a loved one can lead to better days and an improved quality of life for both you and your loved one.

Selling Your Home? Here are Three Tips for Getting it Done Right the First Time

1. Your house must be priced right from the start. Zillow is one example of how “home value calculator” websites are notorious for exaggerating the value of homes. Overpricing your home when you initially list can sometimes cause you to end up losing money in the long run. When you overprice a house, and serious buyers come along, they realize your home isn’t valued at the listing price and will either show complete disregard or possibly counter with a lower rate than the house is worth. Why? Because now they don’t trust you. A good realtor will tell you this isn’t how you get the best value for your home. Price your house appropriately with just a small amount of room to negotiate, and when people check your home’s value against similar dwellings within your area, they will know you are a serious seller and will be more willing to talk price.

2. Choose the right agent from the start! Find an agent that not only has experience within your area, but also shares your same core values. Having an agent that knows how the market is reacting today, and how the buyers are responding to homes, is very important for your agent to understand. Your agent should be an effective communicator and willing to accommodate your schedule and the needs of those living in the home. You want an agent that genuinely cares about you and the sale of your home.

Another consideration when choosing an agent is asking for a list of references and then following up with these clients. Choosing the wrong agent could be very costly, so be sure to prepare a list of questions and treat each realtor appointment as though it were a job interview, because it is! Do your research. Google your realtor prospects. What are others saying about them? Follow them on social media and see how they are representing other clients. Do you like their website? You should, because you’ll be sharing their link on your own social media pages to help with the sale of your home hopefully, or have poor nutritional content for the birds. The National Audubon Society has a webpage to help identify native plants in your area, audubon.org/native-plants/. Just provide a zip code and bird-friendly native plant choices will be suggested.

If gardeners think of their yards as bird habitat, then they will make good decisions when planting time comes. The most important concept is to create habitat layers. Plant large canopy trees such as oaks, maples, birch, and cherries to provide resources such as plentiful food choices, nesting cavities, and roosting spots. Woody shrubs are essential as well. These provide berries, cover from predators and songbird nesting sites. Herbaceous plants include annuals, perennials and ground covers bring in pollinators that will lay eggs and provide insect forage for birds. The bottom layer of the garden is also very important. The ground level that is full of decaying leaves, wood and rich soil provide nesting materials and a home for many of the invertebrates that birds eat, including the pupae of most moth caterpillars, a favorite of baby birds. A water source is also important for our birds. Something as simple as a hollowed-out boulder can catch rainwater. Of course, there are many beautiful bird baths available at the local nursery. Some gardeners provide a drip bath or a fountain feature. Just be sure to keep them clean, operational, and full of fresh water.

In caring for the garden, don’t be too neat. Leave some of the spent blooms on your flowers as they will provide seeds. Leave the leaves! They provide a natural mulch and offer habitat for insects and invertebrates that birds will appreciate. Try to keep some large pieces of wood on the ground, maybe in an out of the way location in the garden. As they decay into rich soil, they will provide cover, food and important fungi for the soil. If possible, leave some dead wood standing for the cavity-nesting birds. Woodpeckers will open holes that will quickly become homes for chickadees, wrens, bluebirds and many more species. Bird houses also benefit these birds.

Finally, to minimize pesticide use, do so only when necessary. A diversity of native plants will attract birds that will keep the number of insects under control. As native plant master Doug Tallamy said, “Garden as if life depends on it.” Rochester Garden Club will host a “Beads, Beautiful Gardens” presentation on Tuesday, March 26 at the Rochester Hills Museum at Van Hoosen Farm. 3. Curb appeal and interior upkeep. These factors are of the utmost importance when preparing to sell. Scheduling an appointment with a home stager can help you with the interior of the house and simple refreshers like a new welcome mat and potted plants at the front door welcome buyers into what could become their next home. It’s also important not to neglect the landscaping and yard. Make sure there is no trash lying around, and a minimalist approach to outdoor décor is best for the sale of your home.

When working with an experienced team of realtors, they have the wisdom to keep up to date with current real estate laws and code of ethics. An experienced realtor is a must because the rules are ever-changing, and you want a someone who’s willing to invest the time and energy to make sure your real estate transaction doesn’t involve any unwanted surprises. We’ve witnessed too many deals where buyers and sellers have been protected through sound business practices on our part, but those clients represented by others have found themselves in an unsettling position with signed documents and are now legally obligated to uphold these contracts. When you have closed as many deals as we have, you learn to successfully guide clients through the real estate process from beginning to end and protect both the buyer and the seller.

Hiring a team of professional realtors like The Linda Rea Team will help you, as they say, “get it done right the first time.”

I’d love the opportunity to sit down with you and go over how we can protect you and one of the biggest investments you will ever make. Make me a call! Paula Rea-Johnston, 248-770-8661.
Walking Club at Somerset Feels Like Family

by ELENA DURNBAUGH

The conversation I had with Cliff Wagoner about the SkyWalker Club at Somerset Collection lasted 27 minutes in total.

In that time, seven different people came over to where we were chatting in the corner of the Williams Sonoma store to say hello, ask a question, or wish him a good week. He greeted each person by name and told me something about them – the person’s role in the club, where they worked, or how long they had been coming to walk at the mall.

The SkyWalker Club provides people with a convenient way to exercise, but the health benefits aren’t what keep people coming back. Members of the club have built a strong sense of community and think of the people there as part of their walking family.

Wagoner, who’s official title at Somerset is merchant relations manager, organizes the club and is proud of the familial camaraderie the walking group has.

“What’s really heart warming is that they don’t seem to mind whether the person is the same color or speaks the same language,” he said. “It’s a very friendly group. It makes it fun to be around.”

Ramesh Joshi, a long-time regular walker, credited Wagoner with fostering the group’s connection.

“He remembers everybody’s name,” Joshi said. “We are all family members. It’s a very happy feeling to be here.”

The tight-knit nature of the group doesn’t make it exclusive, though.

“We still welcome any newcomer to join,” said Joshi’s wife, Hema.

According to Wagoner, the roots of the SkyWalker family tree date back to the 1950s, when the mall would put out bagels once a month for the walkers. Since then, the area, the mall, and the walking club have been through a lot of changes. Now, instead of walking by a table of bagels once a month, the group gathers inside a participating store once a week for a coffee hour where people can socialize.

The group takes its name from the moving-sidewalk that connects the northern and southern part of the mall, which was constructed in 1996. Mark Woodcock has been a member of the club since the mall opened the north side. He said there was nothing like watching the sunrise or looking out over a freshly fallen snow from the sidewalk.

“This place here is almost magical,” Woodcock said.

Woodcock, like many of the club members, started walking to improve his health. He developed a back issue, and walking was part of his physical therapy. Now, coming to the mall is more than exercise. Even after he and his wife moved to Lake Orion, they still drive to Somerset every weekday to walk and catch up with friends over a cup of coffee.

Ken Lesperance started walking five years ago after he had an aortic aneurysm. He said that when he started coming to the mall, he met with security to explain his health condition, and they would track him to make sure that he didn’t fall.

“You feel very safe,” he said. Like Woodcock, Lesperance said he has made a lot of friends in the group.

“They’re like family now,” he said.

SkyWalkers has over 980 registered members, and every Wednesday, about 120 people come to the coffee hour. Those who attend are entered into the weekly drawing for one of four $10 gift cards.

People of all ages participate in the walking club. Although many of them are retired, moms with strollers also come to walk. The oldest member of the SkyWalkers is Skip Eddy. She’s 98 years-old and has been walking at the mall since her husband died in 1980.

“I had to learn to do things alone, and that’s when I started walking,” she said.

Eddy enjoys coming to meet people and getting hugs from the other club members.

“You get lots of hugs,” she said. “They’re good for you.”

Joining the walking club is simple. Those who are interested should send an email to Wagoner at cwagoner@thesomersetcollection.com. Members receive the SkyWalkers Newsletter and a membership badge that entitles them to discounts at certain stores. Doors open at 7 a.m. every day for walkers.

Next month, the SkyWalkers will be participating in the Early Bird Senior Expo at Somerset Collection on Thursday, April 4, from 7:30 a.m. The Early Bird Senior Expo is produced by Gazette Media Group.
